EDITOR'S NOTE

WHEN PEOPLE FIND out what I do for a living, they usually look at me with envious eyes and say something like, "Wow! A professional wrestling photographer! That must be a lot of fun!"

Well, I tell them, it is. I couldn't think of a better job in all the world. While they're fantasizing about how wonderful my life is, I never tell that there are some "buts" attached to that statement that are so big, they would make Faarooq proud. As in:

But ... it's very dangerous work. Wrestlers' bodies are flying all over the ringside area and often come crashing down on the ringside photographers.

But ... it's very difficult work. As the sport has evolved in the 1990s, you're no longer able to get by with focusing on two wrestlers locked in one hold for more than a minute. Today's wrestlers are skywalkers and seem to invent new maneuvers instinctively.

But ... it's a pressure-filled job. You get one chance to capture the most important instance in a match. Miss it—for any number of reasons—and you have to explain why to a not-so-understanding editor-in-chief.

But ... the fans can make your life miserable. I'm used to ringsiders screaming "Down in front," and, based on what they're paying for their seats, I can't say I blame them. But sometimes these people get downright rude. And then there's the matter of fans throwing drinks or, worse, hard objects. It's tough enough protecting myself and my equipment from the wrestlers; now I have to be alert as to what's happening behind me!

Still, I'll admit it: It is a great job. I've photographed a lot of sports, but nothing compares to the two I do most for this publishing company: wrestling and boxing. When you're shooting a sport like football, you stand on the sidelines with a long lens resting on a monopod. The lens' deep focal length brings you close to the action, but only in an artificial sense. You don't feel the players making contact, hear their pain, smell the oils and liniments on their bodies. At ringside, you have a better vantage point than anybody in the building (and you don't have to buy your ticket!).

The posed photo sessions are another story entirely. When you're shooting a wrestler in a studio setting, you find out more about their true nature than anybody else, including, I dare say, the writers. When a wrestler is standing alone in front of a camera, all his or her insecurities are brought to light. A wrestler can lie and boast all he wants on TV, but photographs don't lie—and the wrestlers know it. Some won't pose until they've had a chance to pump themselves up, some preen in front of a mirror for 10 minutes, some just get right in there and let it happen, and some, on any given day, won't cooperate at all.

Photographing pro wrestlers, be it action or in the studio, is always a challenge. The best part, of course, is seeing the fruits of our labor. Even the most experienced of photographers can't tell you with any certainty that they've had a good shoot ... until the pictures are processed. When that film comes back from the lab and you nervously check through your work, you can sense the urgency of the moment from everybody in the office. If a writer turns in a bad story, the editor gives it a rewrite; if a photographer turns in a bad set of photos, the editor gives him a dirty look.

More often than not, PWI's crew of two dozen staff and freelance photographers do a great job. And that's why compiling the pictures for the PWI PHOTO ALBUM was a relatively easy job. Never before have so many color photos been presented in one package. I'll modestly call it the best of the best from PWI's best, the photographers.

Enjoy.
